Written by Mike McCabe, Blue Jean Nation Thursday, 28 July 2016 12:59 - Last Updated Thursday, 28 July 2016 14:09

The major parties are offering voters the two most unpopular nominees in memory. In a little more than three months, voters who are sick and tired of being forced to choose the lesser of evils will be sicker still. Has the time come for the death of one or both of the old major parties and the birth of a new one?

ALTOONA, WI - With pessimism and paranoia and fear of outsiders washing over the countryside, and without a shared sense of national purpose or vision for the future, America will have a presidential election in a little over three months. Here's a prediction: Nose-holding and lesser-evilism will reach epidemic proportions in 2016.

One party is scary and the other is scared. Scary is coming into sharper focus with each passing day. Scared takes the form of excessive caution and unwillingness to serve up anything more than a main course of status quo with a side dish of incremental change.

The parties have chosen who they want at the top of the ballot, and are offering voters the two most unpopular major party nominees in memory. That's not to say

Hillary Clinton

and

Donald Trump

are without admirers. Each has some passionate supporters. Clinton got roughly

15 million votes

on her way to securing the Democratic nomination, and Trump got about to win the Republican nomination. But one of them is going to have to convince about 50 million more voters to trust them with the keys to the White House.

13 million votes

Blue Jean Nation "Yearning to breathe free"

Written by Mike McCabe, Blue Jean Nation Thursday, 28 July 2016 12:59 - Last Updated Thursday, 28 July 2016 14:09

